Breathlessness is a major symptom of congestive heart failure (CHF) and exertional dyspnea is a major limiting factor for patients with CHF. The purpose of this study was to determine the severity of breathlessness during daily activity and its changes after a supervised exercise training program. Forty-five subjects with CHF (New York Heart Association Functional Class II-III) participated in a 24-week supervised program of exercise training, twice-daily sessions for 30 minutes at 75-85% of the heart rate reserve. At baseline and after 24 weeks, patients underwent graded exercise testing to determine maximal exercise capacity (VE) and oxygen uptake at submaximal workloads (VO2). Baseline breathlessness in daily life was assessed using a visual analogue scale (VAS), and breathlessness at rest and during the morning, afternoon, and night was assessed using a VAS. At baseline, mean VAS score of breathlessness at rest was 9.
