According to a former FBI assistant director, cybercrime is surpassing terrorism in terms of the threat to national security and it's only going to get worse. An FBI consultant told Congress on Wednesday that the Islamic State (Isis) has released a total of 25 data sets over the past three months, including information on security services, counterintelligence operations, and the fingerprint records of many people in the United States. "The Islamic State has released 25 data sets of varying size in the past three months," said Ciaramella in an interview with the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee. She added that the FBI, working with the National Counterterrorism Center, has uncovered about 500 active Isis-linked propaganda accounts, which the group uses to encourage attacks and inspire people to "go overseas and do some online good" and to "get offline and do some online evil." "We have observed several pro-Isis channels on social media sites - particularly on Facebook, Instagram, and Twitter - and we are seeing how they use those sites," said Ciaramella. She said the FBI is still analysing these accounts and their impact on potential or potential attackers. "The Isis channels are active and on the go," said Ciaramella. "They are actively seeking to recruit people, they are seeking to inspire people, they are seeking to entice people to action..." "The Islamic State is not going to fade away," she said. "We've seen this as an incubator for networks to be developed, and the networks are going to be developed on their own to continue to carry out acts of violence." There are some questions that still need to be answered, but there's no doubt that the threats the United States is facing are growing.
