For the sake of the many lives lost and the many more who suffer at the hands of violence, it is important that this day continue to be a focal point for organising against this blight. Recent research shows that deaths from violence in London have doubled over the last decade. In 2016, there were 1,816 deaths from crime, some of which could have been prevented. These grim stats are only part of the story. While it is a good thing that so many lives are being saved, it is also important that the victims and survivors of crime are also able to live their lives in a way that is safe and free from fear. At the day of action, which is expected to draw together survivors, bereaved families, survivors of hate crime, witnesses, frontline police officers and anti-violence campaigners, we will be hosting a number of panels and discussions, such as: - The physical impacts of trauma: What does it feel like to live as a survivor of violence? - Is trauma trans-generational? What does this mean for health and wellbeing? - The people who are often forgotten and neglected: Survivor of domestic abuse with ADHD - Understanding the link between homophobia and violence against queer and trans people To reduce violence and hate crime, we all need to play a part. The best way to take action is to reach out to victims, survivors and their families. We can reduce the fear and isolation by being there for them. This is true for those of us in society who want to prevent crime and hate crime, and for the police and other agencies. Being part of a network that is in touch with the people who are on the front lines can help you to be a better ally, and inform you on which issues matter most.
